Second Nuclear Thoughts

"TWO YEARS OF CANADA-United States negotiations on nuclear weapons have gone down the drain," according to the reliable Canadian Press, from Ottawa. All the discussions conducted between the Canadian and American governments when Mr. Eisenhower was president must be started afresh when Mr. Kennedy takes office.

But it is not mainly the American Government that has held up Canada's decision on the acceptance of nuclear arms for its military forces. The delay has been caused for the most part by the inability of the Diefenbaker Government to make up its mind.

Certainly the decision to use these weapons, or not to use them, is a great and wrenching decision. government can be expected to take without long, anxious thought. Nor is it surprising that the cabinet is obviously split on this issue be-tween those who want these weapons and those who, like Mr. Howard Green, are reluctant to accept

Mr. Diefenbaker's own mind, as expressed by his speeches, has drastically changed in the last year or so. This is not said in criticism since in such a grave matter any statesman is entitled to have second thoughts.

The prime minister's first thoughts were uttered on February 1959, when he told Parliament that the full potential of the new weapons planned for Canadian de-fence could be achieved only when they were equipped with nuclear warheads. He was evidently thinking of the Bomarc missiles in Can-ada and also of the new planes for Canada's NATO forces in Europe.

The Government, he said, considered it expedient that the ownership and custody of the nuclear wards should remain with the United States, which would supply them.

By last July Mr. Diefenbaker had begun to modify his view. He said his Government was discussing with the United States the possibility of joint Canadian-American con-trol of the warheads, and no decision had been reached.

Then, on November 24 last, he announced that "no decision will be required while progress toward disarmament continues. . . . We have made it equally clear that we shall not, in any event, consider nuclear weapons until, as a sovereign nation, we have equality in controla joint control. In other words, this problem is not one requiring immediate decision. The course to be taken will be determined in the light of what happens in connection with disarmament and in the light of events as they transpire and develop in the months ahead."

Thus the Canadian policy has changed from American custody of nuclear weapons installed in Canada to joint control, with the apparent hope that these weapons will not be required at all after some progress in world disarmament.

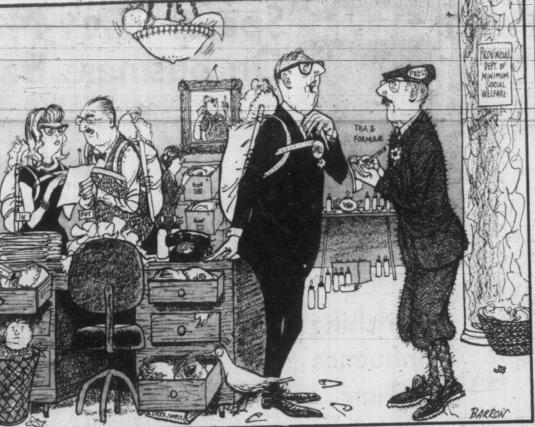

Mr. Green has been working with high courage, much ingenuity and his usual blunt honesty to promote the cause of disarmament. His last resolution on the subject failed recent Assembly of the United Nations but he is preparing to re-introduce it, or some variant, the next meeting in March. In this work he deserves the support of every Canadian and probably has it but, for all his skill and patience, he cannot control the United Nations, much less the policies of the great powers.

If, therefore, no progress can be made on disarmament during the present year the Diefenbaker Government must finally make up its mind on the acceptance or rejection of nuclear weapons. For in this year Canada will begin to take de-livery of its new CF-104 planes and Honest John artillery for its forces in Europe while in Canada the Bomarc bases will be completed. Are all these weapons to be equipped with nuclear capability, as it is called, or not?

If the United States refuses to allow joint control (as forbidden by existing American law) apparently the Canadian Government will refuse to accept any nuclear

Even if joint control is permitted, by a change in American law, as seems quite possible, the main question remains: Should Canada under any condition enter the nuclear arms race? Mr. Pearson says it should not. On that issue his mind is perfectly clear. The same clarity, one way or the other, can properly be required of Mr. Diefenbaker before this year is out.

By the Measurement of Mind and Spirit

IN its Central Office of Information the British government, always the orld's great constitutional inventor, Hutchison colored facts, Britain evidently has concluded, provide the best and only reliable propaganda.

But it is typical of the British that they should keep some of their best goods out of the shop window.

When, for example, I was invited to Britain as the guest of the Commonwealth Relations Office I had heard only vague rumors of the Central Office of Information and had imagined some of Information and had imagined some dingy back office where ancient, Dicken-sian characters wrote bluebooks and press releases read by nobody.

It was agreeably surprising, there-fore, to be taken in hand at the London airport by some of the ablest young men I had ever encountered and given a free run of the whole country.

DID I wish to see a cabinet minister? He was promptly produced, poor fellow, and talked with reckless candor. home in an airplane.

Knowing the ways of governments, however, I suspected that I was getting only the Conservative party line, plea-santly disguised. What about a talk with the government's enemies, the Labor and Liberal parties?

The necessary arrangements were made immediately by the Government's information officers who had no politics, and listened imperturbably while their contemporary boss was condemned by

A PPARENTLY the COI could reach A anyone in London by picking up a telephone or through its scattered provincial offices, anyone in Britain—a factory executive in Birmingham, a worker in a small-town assembly line, a hydroelectrical engineer in the Scottish highlands, the manager of the Stratford Shakespearian theatre, the curator of Dr. Samuel Johnson's queer old house in

Obviously all this didn't happen by ac-cident, though everything was arranged with ut the least fuss or pressure. Ine apparatus of information is far-flung, its casual look deceptive, its officers chosen with minute care. They were not broken-down newspapermen or political hangers-on but specialists in a new profession, and most of them had served their apprenticeship in the remote corners of the commonwealth, at

Thus at some cross-roads of information, an official briefing in some provincial city, one would meet a group of guests from India or Africa, a lark-skinned man wearing a turban, a black man in a strange fur hat, a yellow man taking notes in some native dialect. But they all spoke English and they were all at liberty to make what they pleased of Britain.

Most of them, it seemed to me, were amazed by what they found. Britain was not what they had supposed from the cld legends of colonial times. Nor what most Canadians still suppose, for that

No one, in fact, knows precisely what British society is today, where it is going or how it will end. It is moving too quickly for quick judgments.

That is not the information officer's affair. Whatever Britain may be today or tomorrow he will show it to the visitor not only with overwhelming hospitality (which this reporter tardily but gratefully acknowledges here) but with facts, only facts.

THE British image is presented factually, its glories and its blemishes, its triumphs and its mistakes, in the old-fashioned belief that truth wears better an any propaganda. So it does. And this, I dare say, is one of the many reasons why Britain, usually calling itself a second-rate power now-a-days in outward measurements beside the American and Russian giants, remains a power impossible to reckon on such terms, a first-rate power by the measurement of the mind and spirit.

Political Farming

By TOM GOULD

A GRICULTURE Minister Alvin Ham-ilton has a decided advantage over opposition critics of the Government's farm program. Since taking over the agriculture portfolio, the minister has discovered a way of using the taxpayer's own money to distribute what amounts to political propaganda. The Information Division of the depart-ment has for a number of years been producing a twicepublication monthly entitled "Farm News," that is sent to every farming population.

newspaper and radio station in Canada. In the past, ministers left it alone. It was a purely departmental publication, dealing in matters of concern to Canada's

It carried articles on the control of wild oats, on the use of chemical fer-tilizers, and a wide range of problems studied by the labs and experimental farms operated by the Government.

Mr. Hamilton has decided to take advantage of this publication to spread the Government's views on agriculture. He made his debut as a columnist in the current issue, on the highly-controver-sial subject of allowing feed mills to purchase grain directly from producers without first obtaining delivery quotas from the Canadian Wheat Board.

Officials of the Information Division have been informed that the minister intends providing them with a similar column once a month to start, and may step it up to twice-a-month to make sure he gets in every issue. His first effort takes up one-sixth of the print space in the current issue.

It is an out-an-out defence of the Government's action in the feed mills controversy, and a denial of the claims made by critics of the action.

The Most

People close to Mr. Hamilton say the use of what was a purely departmental information outlet is but one of the first steps toward becoming what the minister describes as "the most political agricultural minister Canada has ever known."

One of his first moves on taking office was to set up a "political file" in his office, something that didn't exist under former minister Doug Harkness, who is now minister of national defence.

Mr. Hamilton obviously plans to spend far more time out on the road, convincing farmers they have never had it better, than in sitting in Ottawa running the department. He has made a dozen major policy speeches

This emphasis on the political aspects of agriculture is readily understandable. The Tories currently have a solid hold on the Prairies, and they want to retain that hold in the next federal election.

Under Mr. Harkness, the farmers illustrated a decided dislike for the Tory farm program, and professional poli-ticians have been saying for months that the West is lost to them unless something is done.

Prime Minister Diefenbaker decided to call on the boundless enthusiasm for work, and more particularly political work, of Mr. Hamilton to stem the tide of dissatisfaction. A lot depends on whether he can pull it off.

Isn't that more appealing and attractive than deficit financing by federal or provincial governments?
